With its central location along the Alabama River, Montgomery has served as a landing and departure point for many populations throughout Alabama's history. In this workshop, participants will learn about significant periods of migration in Alabama's history and the way the movement of people shaped the state. Through pedagogical concepts aimed at sparking student interest and comprehension of population dispersion patterns, participants will explore its repercussions on economic and agricultural development in our state and worldwide. Presenters will consistently employ strategies relevant to instruction in geography, history, human geography, economics, and culture.
